In a world where encryption is available off the internet to any citizen of the United States who wants it, wiretapping is an outdated model of intelligence. Imposing it on VoIP will only burden an emerging technology with archaic shackles. If the intelligence community wishes to read my voice data, then they should be able to find a more subtle way of doing so, and, most importantly, one that's on their own dime (or at least funded with the money I already pay them).
